

Kris Johnson, PhD, is a senior social research scientist with Public Health – Seattle & King County’s Assessment, Policy Development & Evaluation division. Prior to joining King County, she taught prevention science, family theory and research methods at the University of Minnesota. Prior to joining UMN, Johnson conducted research for social service agencies across the United States and in Australia and Canada to assist efforts to prevent child maltreatment. Johnson has also worked with financial assistance, juvenile justice, adult corrections and adult protective service agencies and is committed to collaborative, community-based research and an equitable evaluation framework.